

40 years in business

The Interface Financial Group allows individuals to enter the financial service market with an established and proven model

On a Thursday late in April 1972, The Interface Financial Group was born when John Sheehy bought his first single invoice. Since that day Interface has grown from a one location invoice discounter into an international organisation.

Along the way Interface changed its business model to make growth more attainable on an international level. This was achieved through the creation of a unique franchise model. John Sheehy, the Interface founder, was innovative from day one when he created a transactional approach that allowed his client to sell just one invoice to cover an immediate cash need.

ACCELERATE

That innovative streak has been inherent in Interface's approach to business over the past four decades. It has created a business approach that is specifically geared to helping small business owners accelerate their cash flow, doing so in a financial climate when other more established funders are exiting the small to medium-sized enterprise marketplace.

This in demand service has been crafted into an innovative franchise offering that allows individuals to enter the financial service market with an established and proven model. It has been purposefully designed as a home-based business with a substantial emphasis on client service. To this end, transactions are often concluded in a matter of two-three days, as opposed to the more traditional two-three weeks or more.

Interface is securely established in seven countries, with its most recent expansion being into the UK market. Innovation was again prevalent as it crafted its UK operation along the lines of a 'spot factoring' approach in order to reinforce its commitment to the SME sector.

Invoice discounting in the UK is a service often geared to companies with substantial turnovers and financing requirements. In celebrating 40 years in business, Interface continues to expand its UK base and is currently looking for seasoned executives seeking the challenge of self-employment and entrepreneurship in a growth environment.
