In-Demand franchise organization meets the working capital needs of small business owners

Franchising has long been an accepted method of entering the business world without the attendant risks of a traditional start-up business. The Interface Financial Group is a franchised business model that allows entrepreneurs to contribute to their local economy while owning a stable, well established financial services business.

Irvine, CA (April 7, 2010) – David Banfield, President of The Interface Financial Group reports from their Irvine CA headquarters that the Interface franchise continues to be an ‘in-demand’ business model. He states that not only does the franchise afford the usual facets of a franchise but in the case of Interface it also brings help to local business communities.

The recession continues to be a major concern for small business owners. With banks closing on a weekly basis there are fewer and fewer opportunities for small businesses to find growth capital.

Interface has perfected a franchise model that can provide the working capital assistance needed by small business. In these difficult economic times Interface is helping to stimulate small businesses, accelerate their cash flow and fuel their growth. Growth that, in many instances, ultimately turns into the creation of new jobs, saves existing jobs, and acts as a stimulus to local economies.

Interface certainly has a ‘feel good’ approach when it comes to helping small business and many entrepreneurs are realizing this and helping The Interface Financial Group grow not only domestically in the US marketplace, but in a number of other countries as far away as Australia and New Zealand.
